

Its certainly extremely messy with the current World Athletics Championships being held when you take into account given there has been more than 180 doping sanctions handed out to Kenyans since 2017. In Kenya, there's "a temptation to dope that's like no other part of our sport, not even close," said Brett Clothier, the head of the Athletics Integrity Unit, the independent body set up in 2017 to oversee international track and field's anti-doping operations and which has been kept very busy by Kenya. In what is now widely regarded is that the vast majority of the hundreds of distance runners pouring out of Kenya's high-altitude training grounds are not running for gold medals at the world championships and the Olympics or for national pride. They are competing for money first, plus running to get away from poverty. "This money that we're talking about ... is life-changing," Clothier said. "Not just for them, but for their families, their whole communities. In essence, it really is all about the money."

Anyway Aussie Nina Kennedy and

American Katie Moon have shared the gold pole vault medal both clearing a height of 4.90 metres before they both fell short at 4.95 metres . The Crows goal post drama has reminded a few tragics about when Neil Kerley a few Westies players chopped down the same goalpost after the 1958 Grand Final .
